Subject: Manchin drafting bill in response to West Virginia chemical spill

Sen. Joe Manchin told reporters today that he is working on legislation in response to last week's massive West Virginia chemical spill, which left 300,000 people without access to tap water.

"There shouldn't be anything that goes unmonitored or uninspected," he said in the Capitol.

The West Virginia Democrat said he approached Senate Environment and Public Works Chairwoman Barbara Boxer about the bill and she is "very agreeable." He is also talking to other senators to determine their interest in supporting the bill.

"What we're looking at basically is, under the Clean Water Act, any time there is any type of disposal or any type of tank storage or anything, no matter what it is, it has got to be inspected and certain standards have to be adhered to," he said.

"It's not just West Virginia. This could happen anywhere," he said, arguing that there should be federal legislation to address the issue.

Asked when he will unveil the bill, Manchin said, "We're going to have something drafted as quickly as possible."

"I'm not attacking any chemical specifically. I'm basically attacking how we can have for two decades nothing inspected or even looked at, even though it wasn't supposed to be toxic or lethal. It's still very hazardous and that should come under some kind of review process," Manchin added.
